

Introduction:

Scott used three stories to tell us his different attempts to get over his fear of flying so he could go on his honeymoon and enjoy the flight

Positive Points	Improvement Points
Excellent body language – you can tell he thought about this. Example: stepping back quickly to show his reluctance to get on the plane	Scott started by telling us about his fear, then told a story. It may have more effective to start the story and use that narrative to introduce his fear
Good use of volume and pitch. Example: Speaking quieter to draw the audience in	Incorporate speaking at different speeds. For example, speak quicker to show excitement.
Liked the way he used personal stories to emphasis his research.	The second story had a few unnecessary details around the spider types which made it feel a little laboured at times. Next time, check all elements of the story are needed and help to progress it

Conclusion:

Three really interesting stories woven around real research he used to cure his fear of flying. The storytelling was awesome and linked the research in a clever way. Some of the stories could have been a bit tighter in content so the audience weren't lost in unnecessary detail but the stories, along with his excellent body language helped deliver a memorable speech, and I can't wait to see how he gets on with his honeymoon.
